THAILAND CHILD PROTESTERS TARGETED

Thai authorities are prosecuting and harassing child human rights defenders for peacefully exercising their right to protest. Among the 283 children targeted with criminal proceedings, authorities have sentenced LGBTI campaigner Thanakorn 'Petch' Phiraban, are investigating Chan Tonnamphet, an indigenous land rights activist, and are trying 'Sand', a youth activist, for protesting when they were under 18 years old.

Since mid-2020, Thai authorities, in an ongoing crackdown on peaceful protest, have initiated criminal and civil proceedings against at least 283 children for peacefully exercising their rights by taking part in nationwide protests calling for political reforms, improvement to the education system, protection of minority rights, and gender equality. The Thai government has also subjected child human rights defenders to harassment, surveillance, and intimidation. There's growing concern that the crackdown is having a wider chilling effect on children's ability to enjoy their right to protest.

Thailand has international obligations, including under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, to protect and ensure children's rights to freedom of expression and peaceful assembly, so they can exercise them without fear of reprisals. These rights are important for children to be able to campaign for human rights and other issues affecting them.

Write to the Prime Minister of Thailand urging him to:

- Drop all criminal proceedings, quash convictions, and end harassment and intimidation of children, targeted simply for peacefully exercising their human rights;
- Respect, protect and fulfil the rights of children to freedom of peaceful assembly and expression; and
- Amend or repeal legislation which is incompatible with international standards relating to the exercise of these rights.

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

In 2020 young people, including university and secondary school students under 18 years old, started a wave of peaceful protests across Thailand. The demonstrations spread from schools and universities to the streets. In response, Thai authorities detained and targeted participants and organizers with criminal charges - particularly after the protests focused on calls for reforms related to the monarchy.

Originally triggered by calls for democratic reform, the youth-led protest movement encompassed calls for constitutional change, social reforms, an end to official repression of government critics, improved education, and school safety. Participants also campaigned for the rights of women, indigenous people, LGBTI people and ethnic minorities. Street protests featured parties, debates, flash-mobs, sit-ins, live theatre and music, fashion shows, and art. Young people shared their activities and opinions on online platforms. Protesters deployed parody, satire, and images of popular youth culture to illustrate their calls for change. Teenagers and younger children under 18, often in school uniforms or street fashion, were the public face of these demonstrations.

Since mid-2020, Thai authorities, in an ongoing crackdown on peaceful protest, have initiated criminal and civil proceedings against at least 283 children for peacefully exercising their rights. Children who participated in peaceful demonstrations or shared their views on society and politics in public speeches or satirical comments online have faced detention, long-running legal proceedings, intimidation, harassment, and surveillance.

Authorities have prosecuted the majority of these children for violating official restrictions on public gatherings imposed to control the spread of Covid-19 under the Emergency Decree, which allows for two years' imprisonment and/or a fine. The Decree was enforced through the declaration of an emergency situation for over two years between March 26, 2020 and September 30, 2022. Children also face charges under Article 112 of the Criminal Code governing lèse majesté, and Article 116 of the Criminal Code governing sedition. Article 112 allows three to 15 years' imprisonment for "whoever, defames, insults or threatens the King, the Queen, the Heir-apparent or the Regent". Article 116 of the Criminal Code allows for seven years imprisonment and prohibits people "to raise unrest and disaffection amongst the people in a manner likely to cause disturbance in the country; or to cause the people to transgress the laws of the Country". International human rights experts have recommended Thai authorities amend or repeal these and other laws in order to comply with Thailand's international human rights obligations.

Thanakorn 'Petch' Phiraban, an LGBTI activist from Bangkok, was found guilty on November 22 and December 22, 2022 on two separate counts of violating Article 112 of the Penal Code, for speeches at peaceful protests in Bangkok in September and December 2020. They were the first child to be prosecuted for lèse-majesté and have to serve a sentence to attend “training” at a vocational and youth training center. Authorities suspended Thanakorn’s second sentence and will impose conditions of probation on Thanakorn. Officials are pursuing further charges under Article 112 of the Penal Code and the Emergency Decree against them.

Chan Tonnaphet, an 18-year-old Indigenous Karen community rights activist is currently under police investigation for violating emergency restrictions on peaceful protest when 17-years-old, in January 2022. She made a public speech at a sit-in protest in support of her community’s calls on authorities, joining the protest to represent the voices of community members who could not speak Thai. Members of her community have faced human rights violations including the enforced disappearance of human rights defender Billy Rakchongcharoen, stemming from their forcible eviction and relocation from their ancestral lands in Kaeng Krachan National Park, Petchaburi Province, western Thailand.

‘Sand’ (alias to protect her identity) is a 17-year-old rights defender, who took part in protests for equality at school and for political change. She has faced surveillance and harassment for her activism, in addition to eleven charges under the Emergency Decree and related legislation for her participation in peaceful protest. She currently faces charges for violating the Emergency Decree for attending a protest in Bangkok during her school holidays.
