Tell Samsung to investigate its supply chain for possible human rights abuses

To the CEO of Samsung:

Amnesty International research shows that major electronics brands are failing to adequately investigate their supply chains for human rights abuses as required by international standards.

Amnesty International is calling on companies to investigate their cobalt supply chain and prove they are addressing human rights abuses.

Accordingly, I request that Samsung publicly disclose on its website the following:

- 1. Whether the cobalt in Samsung's products has been mined by child labourers or adults working in hazardous conditions.
- 2. If not, the steps Samsung has taken to verify this information.
- 3. If yes, the steps Samsung has taken to address child labour or adults working in hazardous conditions in your supply chain (e.g. collaboration with governments, suppliers ...).
- 4. Provide the names of cobalt smelters/refiners in Samsung's supply chain (including identification of where the cobalt was sourced), as well as their due diligence policies and practices.

HUMAN RIGHTS SMART?

Please submit petition by September 2016 to: Amnesty International 430-319 West Pender Street Vancouver, BC, V6B 1T3

We all increasingly rely on rechargeable batteries to power our mobile phones, tablets, laptop computers, cameras and other portable electronic devices. We enjoy the benefits that these new technologies bring, but do you know where the raw materials come from that go into them and how those raw materials were extracted?

Cobalt is a key component in the lithium-ion rechargeable batteries that power these portable electronic devices.

Half of the world's cobalt comes from the Democratic Republic of the Congo where Amnesty International has documented adults and children as young as seven working in hazardous conditions without any protective clothing or equipment.

Miners risk their lives to mine this precious black rock when they go down into the pits.

One boy named Paul told Amnesty International that he often worked for 24 hours straight in an underground tunnel mining cobalt when he was only 12 years old. He was paid $1-2 dollars a day.

Other children spend hours working on the surface sorting, sifting, washing and transporting heavy sacks of cobalt ore, which ends up in our smartphones, laptops and other portable electronic devices.

Samsung is failing to do basic checks to ensure that cobalt mined by child labourers and adults working in hazardous conditions has not been used in their products.

It is time Samsung took some responsibility for the mining of the raw materials that make their lucrative products.

Tell Samsung that you want to know that your phone or a laptop is free of raw materials mined by child labourers and adults working in hazardous conditions.

Tell Samsung that you want to buy a product that isn't linked to human rights abuses.
